Field Schools in Practice: A Round-Table Discussion

Ivory

Do you have questions or concerns about organizing a field school? Does your university want more information on what this will involve for students in terms of safety, travel, visas, and politics? We will be holding an open discussion at ASOR to share experience and best practices for navigating the potential obstacles for bringing students to participate in field schools. We will also discuss the pedagogies and curricula of field schools and how successful these are. This round-table welcomes directors and associate/assistant directors on excavations that function as field schools.

MODERATOR: Asa Eger

PANELISTS:

David Ilan (Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion)

Yorke M. Rowan (University of Chicago)
Melissa Bailey Kutner (University of Maryland, Baltimore County)

Session 10

10A. Interconnected Communities in the Eastern Mediterranean and Western Asia—The Third to Early Second Millennium B.C.E. II

Emerald Ballroom

Theme: This session investigates the social processes that resulted in establishing a landscape of connectivity during the third to early second millennia B.C.E. Papers will examine the nature of contact between communities, present new data, and explore how such interaction changed the social landscape from various methodological, regional, and theoretical perspectives.

10D. Talking About: Jobs, Fieldwork, and Family (Workshop)

Opal

CHAIRS: Beth Alpert Nakhai (University of Arizona) and Jennie Ebeling (University of Evansville)

This ASOR Initiative on the Status of Women workshop explores ways in which people, especially women, who work in Near Eastern archaeology manage the challenges of jobs, fieldwork, and family. In this workshop, individuals (whether engaged in fieldwork or not) will reflect upon the ways in which they have accomplished or modified their goals, the ways in which they have succeeded, and the ways in which they have been stymied by personal and/or professional obstacles to success. Short personal statements, solicited in advance through the ISW Facebook page and elsewhere, will be read by Ebeling and Nakhai at the beginning of the workshop. This will be followed by an open-mic session focusing on opening conversations, sharing ideas, and considering solutions to problems shared by many of us.

10E. Archaeology of the Near East and Video Games

Diamond 1

Theme: This session offers a multidisciplinary discussion of theoretical and methodological approaches to the study of archaeology and video-games. This framework of “archaeogaming” includes the use of archaeological methods within game worlds, the creation of video-games for, or about, archaeological practices, and the critical study of how archaeology is represented within video-games.
